Tracking the trade conflict disruption

- We expect a U.S. contraction this year given supply disruptions from tariffs. We stay overweight U.S. stocks as the artificial intelligence theme rolls on.
- Above-consensus U.S. payrolls data helped boost risk assets last week, with U.S. stocks climbing 3%. U.S. 10-year Treasury yields ended the week steady.
- The Federal Reserve confronts sharpening policy tradeoff it between weaker activity and sticky inflation at its meeting this week as seen in the Q1 GDP data.

The trade conflict between the U.S. and China is causing major economic disruptions. If tariffs stay at current levels, we expect a supply-driven contraction in U.S. activity this year. Yet this is very different from a typical business cycle recession given Covid-like supply constraints. Hard economic rules binding on policy may limit the damage. The AI mega force keeps us overweight U.S. stocks and positive on developed market stocks, even with more volatility likely.

Getting ahead of tariffs

Contribution to annualized U.S. GDP growth, 2020-2025

Source: BlackRock Investment Institute, U.S. Bureau of Economic Analysis, with data from Haver Analytics, April 2025. Note: The chart shows the contribution to of various economic activities to quarterly U.S. GDP growth, shown on an annualized basis. The grey bars include consumer & government spending, and non-residential & residential investment.

U.S. tariffs and uncertainty initially sparked concerns about waning confidence and declining demand. That's now evolving into supply-driven disruptions, akin to the difficulties U.S. companies faced getting inputs for goods during the Covid-19 shock. Case in point: Companies rushed to import goods during Q1 to get ahead of tariffs, leading to a record surge in imports. See the orange bar in the chart. Along with a surge in inventories, we expect more volatility in activity data that don't yet reflect the ensuing disruptions since the April 2 tariff announcement, especially the maximal U.S. stance on China. If current steep tariffs stay in place between the U.S. and China, we see a supply-driven economic contraction tied to trade-related disruptions like the Covid-19 shock. This contraction is not a typical business cycle recession – and one we can look through on a tactical horizon.

We expect a contraction marked by production shutdowns, bottlenecks and shortages like during the pandemic – though spending on services won't be as directly affected. Activity may also restart quickly as it did during the pandemic. These supply-driven elements could bolster the inflationary pressure from tariffs, building on already high inflation. That presents the Fed with a sharper trade-off between protecting growth by coming to the rescue with rate cuts and reining in inflation. We track a range of indicators – like port traffic, capital spending plans and high-frequency financial and consumer spending data – to monitor how the supply-driven shock ripples out. This reinforces the hard economic rule that supply chain dependencies can't be rewired quickly without disruption. If these rules constrain negotiations, damage could be limited.

Some sectors are more exposed to tariffs than others – with sectoral differences already at play in Q1 earnings reports. The companies at the forefront of the AI mega force have largely kept driving U.S. equity strength, while policy uncertainty weighs more heavily on the rest of the market. Some big tech companies have beat Q1 earnings expectations, noted surging AI-driven demand and announced plans to increase AI-related investment. That underscores how the AI mega force persists, even with major supply-driven disruptions – keeping us positive on developed market (DM) stocks, especially the U.S. On the flip side, automakers are among the most exposed to key supply inputs from China, with some flagging the impact of tariffs in their full-year earnings guidance. The longer policy uncertainty lasts, the deeper the damage could be.

We have evolved our views as markets have adjusted to uncertainty. Just two days after April 2, we reduced risk by cutting our tactical horizon to three months. Yet the 90-day tariff pause showed economic rules can spur changes in policy. That led us to return our tactical horizon to six to 12 months to dial up exposure to developed market stocks. On a longer-term horizon, key questions remain about the best way to tap into an economic transformation, if investor bias for domestic assets will prevail, the outlook for the U.S. dollar's haven status, and investing in private markets amid structurally higher interest rates.

Bottom line: We expect tariffs at current levels to spur a supply-driven contraction this year, while supply disruptions boost inflation. The AI theme keeps us positive on DM stocks, especially the U.S., though more volatility is likely ahead.

Market backdrop

The above-consensus U.S. payrolls data helped boost risk assets and offset a drop in some tech shares on concerns about the tariff impact. The S&P 500 climbed 3% last week, closing the gap with where it was before April but still down 8% from the February all-time highs. U.S. 10-year Treasury yields ended the week at 4.31%, up about 40 basis points from their April lows. Markets have priced out some Federal Reserve rate cuts and now see a first quarter-point cut coming as soon as July.

Week ahead

May 6

U.S. trade data

May 8

Bank of England policy decision

May 7

Federal Reserve policy decision

May 9

China trade data

The Federal Reserve takes center stage this week. Last week's U.S. Q1 GDP report showed major disruptions to activity even before the April 2 tariff announcement, sharpening the tradeoff the Fed faces between lower growth and higher inflation. Even with the contraction of activity we expect, we don't see the Fed cutting rates as much as the market is pricing in. U.S. and China trade data for March will reflect some of the frontloading of U.S. imports before the tariffs.

Big calls

Our highest conviction views on six- to 12-month (tactical) and over five-year (strategic) horizons, May 2025

Tactical	Reasons
U.S. equities	Policy uncertainty and supply disruptions are weighing on near-term growth, raising the risk of a contraction. Yet we think U.S. equities will regain global leadership as the AI theme keeps providing near-term earnings support and could drive productivity in the long term.
Japanese equities	We are overweight. Ongoing shareholder-friendly corporate reforms remain a positive. We prefer unhedged exposures given the yen's potential strength during bouts of market stress.
Selective in fixed income	Persistent deficits and sticky inflation in the U.S. make us underweight long-term U.S. Treasuries. We also prefer European credit – both investment grade and high yield – over the U.S. on more attractive spreads.
Strategic	Reasons
Infrastructure equity and private credit	We see opportunities in infrastructure equity due to attractive relative valuations and mega forces. We think private credit will earn lending share as banks retreat – and at attractive returns.
Fixed income granularity	We prefer DM government bonds over investment grade credit given tight spreads. Within DM government bonds, we favor short- and medium-term maturities in the U.S., and UK gilts across maturities.
Equity granularity	We favor emerging over developed markets yet get selective in both. EMs at the cross current of mega forces – like India and Saudi Arabia – offer opportunities. In DM, we like Japan as the return of inflation and corporate reforms brighten the outlook.

Tracking five mega forces

Mega forces are big, structural changes that affect investing now – and far in the future. As key drivers of the new regime of greater macroeconomic and market volatility, they change the long-term growth and inflation outlook and are poised to create big shifts in profitability across economies and sectors. This creates major opportunities – and risks – for investors. See our web hub for our research and related content on each mega force.

- 1. Demographic divergence: The world is split between aging advanced economies and younger emerging markets – with different implications.
- 2. Digital disruption and artificial intelligence (AI): Technologies are transforming how we live and work.
- 3. Geopolitical fragmentation and economic competition: Globalization is being rewired as the world splits into competing blocs.
- 4. Future of finance: A fast-evolving financial architecture is changing how households and companies use cash, borrow, transact and seek returns.
- 5. Transition to a low-carbon economy: The transition is set to spur a massive capital reallocation as energy systems are rewired.
